

BUILDING IN PUBLIC

I'm building a period tracker. Here's the gap I found.

A $1B category with two cracks running straight through the middle of it.

LUNARFLOW

Swipe →

FIRST — DEMAND ISN'T THE QUESTION

Somebody already proved the ceiling.

$1B

Flo's valuation, 2024 — the first purely digital consumer women's health app to hit unicorn status

77M

Monthly active users, on 300M+ registered

The category itself is going from $2.49B this year to a projected $13.1B by 2035.

Nobody needs convincing that people will install a cycle tracker and hand it intimate data. They already did.

The category spent its trust.

In 2021 the FTC found the category leader had shared health data with Facebook and Google analytics after promising it wouldn't.

September 2025: Google paid $48M and Flo paid $8M to settle a class action over period-tracking data.

Four years after the FTC order. Same category, same failure.

And the guesses are mostly wrong.

8%

Of ovulation predictions
exactly correct, across 10
popular apps

67%

Ran 2–9 days
early for anyone
whose cycle isn't textbook

0

Apps that warned you the prediction might be wrong

Being wrong is forgivable — cycles are noisy and everyone is running a calendar estimate.

Being wrong silently is not.

SO HERE'S WHAT I BUILT

Ask deeply. Predict honestly. Explain personally.

- No fertility percentage, ever. False precision reads as permission.
- Predictions vanish below confidence rather than degrading quietly.
- A disclaimer on every fertility surface — the thing the research found nobody does.
- An 11-question intake so the app can say something true on day one.
- Encrypted on-device, verified on real hardware, not just in tests.

Two of my own questions can't be justified. My code says so.

I found a comment I'd written months earlier, about two signup questions I later made mandatory anyway:

"They carry no gynaecological signal while being among the most sensitive things this app could store."

Nothing in the app consumes them. They're first on the list to cut.

Building in public means posting that one too.

